

“New Yorkers who’ve made the brave decision to seek treatment for substance use disorder should be supported every step of the way, and I’ll always do everything I can to help people rebuild their lives and get back to work.”

Assemblyman Jones is supporting New Yorkers in recovery

Expanding job opportunities

This year's state budget contains $2 million in tax credits for businesses that hire New Yorkers in a state-approved rehabilitation center, an idea first proposed by Assemblyman Jones in 2017. This measure will go a long way toward helping those who are recovering from substance use disorder gain steady employment and is supported by local businesses and advocates.

Combating the opioid crisis

Jones also secured $50,000 in the budget to help strengthen the Champlain Valley Family Center's substance use disorder programs.
